Dear Katherine,

I accept the re-cutting of growths from the previously lopped Sycamore. there are other larger Sycamore trees which have been similarly treated and may require similar treatment due to weaker attachment points caused by their crown lopping. However the English Oak is a good tree and there is no discernable lopping points where a crown reduction of 25% could be cut back to without spoiling its overall natural aesthetic appearance. I feel this trees is an important amenity feature within the landscape and no Arboricultural justification exists for allowing the crown reduction to proceed.

Yours sincerely

Ian Brewster
