Dear Mrs Oldfield,

Some further thoughts about your horse chestnut tree. Depending on what you apply for, it is also worth considering a crown reduction or pollarding to reduce the overall size of the tree and proportionally manage the level of risk that the tree presents. I don't wish to pre-empt the decision of the arboricultural consultant, my thoughts are removing the tree entirely may be considered an overreaction and the tree could be retained in a more compact form with the dead or diseased wood removed. This would be a little cheaper, but ultimately putting off the inevitable. As discussed, if you were to apply for a fell you would need to justify the reason. If that were refused then a recommendation would be made (i.e crown reduction or pollard) and if you were agreeable to this the application could simply be varied, and as it is 'in the system' this would be quicker than having to reapply.

Please see the quote below the fell the horse chestnut.

Hi Amber

A crown reduction of 2-3 metres would be acceptable.

Dear Richard

Following previous emails, the applicant would like to revise the description for the works to the tree whereby you suggest a crown reduction/pollarding.

Bernie also advised

'I believe there is a pruning solution involving the removal of all dead branches and dieback and then lightly reshaping and reduce the height overall to make safe and give solid framework for future growth'.

Please may you advise how much crown reduction is acceptable for the revised description.

Thank you

Amber
