Guide to home broadband

When comparing home broadband its important to consider what broadband packages are right for you. If you're a family, with a few of you online at the same time, then you're more likely to need a faster broadband connection. This doesn't necessarily have to be expensive as many broadband suppliers are offering home broadband with free laptops.

When looking at the comparebroadband.co.uk table, the important pieces of information are; the contract length, broadband speed and of course the price.

What affects broadband speed?

There are many factors within your own home that will impact broadband performance, including the quality of your router, whether you're accessing your broadband via a wired or wireless network and even how fast your computer is. It's also important to consider the location of your local telephone exchange as this will determine what the broadband providers can actually give you in terms of speed.

What internet service provider are in my area?

Another important consideration is what internet service providers are available to you and how they look to differentiate themselves. Virgin is almost alone in offering fibre optic broadband to the consumer, BT are carrying out trials, but for the time being at least, Virgin is a good option for super-fast broadband. BT has excellent broadband coverage throughout the UK and consistently provide good deals to customers. Talk Talk are good value and have an excellent forum that customers use to help diagnose and fix problems. O2 are focussed on customer service, for which they are frequently awarded and praised as industry leaders.

Other considerations

The most important thing is that you choose the right broadband provider for you and what you use the internet for. If you're only going to use your broadband for surfing the internet, sending and receiving emails, you'll be okay with a standard broadband package. Fast broadband becomes more important when you're watching a lot of videos over the internet or downloading a lot of rich media content.
