Hello Michael

The same principle applies to this one, i.e. that as yet nothing is known of the archaeological interest that the site might contain. As far as the EIA is concerned, therefore, there would seem to be little to be gained from including an assessment of archaeology at this stage. However, it should contain a short consideration of the general potential of the area, not least as a guideline to the mitigation measures that would be likely to be required ahead of development.

Best wishes,

James
