This appears to be a small scale operation, initially for a temporary period, within a building (glasshouse) that should not give rise to air pollution problems.

It should be noted that the horticultural business has not operated for some time (Aug 2001) and it is questionable that there will be adequate use for the compost produced to be used on the site, which I understand exempts the activity from Waste Management Regs requirements? The Environment Agency should comment further on this aspect..

It is unusual in my experience for composting to be carried out within a glasshouse and insufficient information is available on how this may affect management of the process. High temperatures may accelerate microbial activity leading to anaerobic conditions within windrows and odour production. Frequent turning of windrows to prevent this within an enclosed environment may lead to production of bio aerosols which could present a health and safety problem to workers in this environment.

Adequate control should be exercised to ensure that only fresh green waste is brought onto the site and that this is effectively managed, as partially rotted green waste and other materials could lead to odours arising from the 'green waste storage area'
