There is no known archaeological reason to oppose the change of use. However, any proposal to develop the site should be accompanied by a desk-based assessment of the structures and deposits of historic and archaeological interest that it contains, and is likely to contain, in order to ensure appropriate preservation of their significance. Of particular relevance are the early medieval settlement that is likely to have clustered around the parish church, the line of the post-medieval canal and the general potential that this part of the coastal plain has to contain evidence of prehistoric and Roman settlement and land management.
